Ladies and Gentlemen,

Next week I am going to present to you one of the most interesting plays of recent years. It is called "DEEP ARE THE ROOTS", by James Gow and Arnaud d'Usseau, and was originally produced in London at the Criterion Theatre. It is a play which deals with the very controversial question of the colour bar. It takes place in the Southern States of America, where the colour bar is a problem of prime importance.

The story is that of a young negro who returns home after service abroad as an officer, where he has been treated by the English as an equal and has been entertained in their homes. His mother is in service in the home of Senator Langdon and, on his return, he finds that the colour bar is as strong as ever and life for him is full of very difficult problems. Although the play does not by any means solve the problem, the subject has been woven into an intensely interesting and dramatic play by the authors.

With compliments,

Yours sincerely,
